

Script Writing Tips

Unless you were born to the task of improvisation (lucky you!), having a script when you're performing a play or making a movie is a great idea. But how to write a script and what are the essential elements of a good script?

- 1. The first step in writing your script is to plan your outline. It could be that your script is telling a story, in which case you will need to know your story and plot it out. If you're planning on presenting some research and want a script, work out what it is you want your audience to know and in what order you want to share it. Having an outline is like having a map; it will tell you where to go with your script.
- 2. What journey is your lead character going to take through your script? Knowing what you want your lead characters to do or what actions you want them to take in your story is essential. Once you have worked out the details of the lead character/s, you can begin working out some of the other characters. You could even create little drawings of all your characters to help bring those characters to life for you. Understanding a bit more about your characters will help you 'get into their heads' and write for those characters. Give your characters their names and start adding their journeys to your script.
- 3. Think about the setting for your story. Where is your story set and how does the setting affect the characters and story? Again, consider doing a drawing of your setting so you can see what your characters are working with. If your setting changes in your story, remember to write down when and how it changes in your script.
- 4. It's time to start adding in some stage directions so that the performers know what they are doing. Stage directions make it easier for your actors to practice their lines and understand the action that is occurring. They will also help the director to bring your script to life.
- 5. Now it's time to start writing the lines. You need to try and make your lines fit with the personalities and emotions of your characters, and with the stage directions you've already added. Think creatively when writing your lines, and think about how your lines can keep your story moving forward.
- 6. Edit! When you think you're finished, go back over what you've written and take out anything that doesn't relate to the story, even if it's fantastic.
- 7. Hold a read through. Ask some friends to read through the script for you, taking on different characters you've created. Listen closely to what works and what doesn't. Consider editing your script again to make it flow better and tell your story more smoothly.
- 8. Perform!
